GV408: Contemporary Disputes about Justice

Go to section

Note

Type: Note Notes: Overview The course offers a critical analysis of key debates about what constitutes a just society, often defined as a society where benefits and burdens are justly distributed. The course is divided into three sections. First, we will discuss John Rawls's theory of justice as fairness and various critiques of his theory, including that it pays insufficient attention to questions of race and gender and that it allows for too much inequality. Second, we will explore several alternative conceptions of justice and injustice, as elaborated by Iris Marion Young, Ronald Dworkin and Elizabeth Anderson. Third, we will explore how justice can be realised by exploring three practical issues of justice and injustice: whether questions of distributive justice should extend globally; reparations for historical injustice; and which economic institutions are required by justice. Student note: Overview The course offers a critical analysis of key debates about what constitutes a just society, often defined as a society where benefits and burdens are justly distributed. Note

Type: Note Notes: Assessment The course is assessed through one max 4000-word paper (the word count includes everything except the bibliography), due by TBD. Please submit your essay via Moodle. Students may submit an optional formative essay of maximum 2500 words, due no later than TBD. (Please see the "submission icons" on the Moodle page for detailed instructions.) Essay requirements: Please ensure that you (i) word-process your essay, (ii) use font of size 12, (iii) indicate page numbers, (iv) include references using the same notational conventions consistently throughout your essay, (v) provide a bibliography containing all and only those works cited in the essay. Essay tips: Read the essay question carefully. Your essay should begin with a clear introduction, including a brief statement of your conclusion and detailing how your argument will develop section-by-section. Do not try to squeeze too many points into the essay, what matters is that you give a focused and coherent answer to the essay question. An excellent way to test the cogency and coherence of your essay is to try to summarize it in a 5-minute presentation (or to write a handout). This will force you to focus on the key points of the essay and improve the quality of your written work. Student note: Assessment The course is assessed through one max 4000-word paper (the word count includes everything except the bibliography), due by TBD. Week 2: Justice as Fairness

Go to section

Note

Type: Note Notes: The first session offers an overview of John Rawls' theory of justice as articulated in his two principles of justice as fairness. The theory offers an influential vision of a society that combines equality of opportunity with efficiency and respect for individual rights. We shall examine the relation between the liberty principle and the difference principle, the design of the original position, Rawls's ideas of natural and social lotteries, and on the defensibility of Rawls' proposed scheme of 'justified inequalities'. Sample questions: • Is the original position the correct procedure for selecting principles of justice? • Do Rawls's two principles of justice follow from the original position? Student note: The first session offers an overview of John Rawls' theory of justice as articulated in his two principles of justice as fairness. Week 3: Justice and Gender

Go to section

Note

Type: Note Notes: In Rawls's initial formulation of the original position, gender was not specified as one of the characteristics hidden from parties in the original position. Nor were issues of gender injustice discussed at great length in Theory of Justice and the place of the family was left unclear. Feminist critics consequently heavily criticized Rawls for these oversights. Feminists have, however, disagreed over whether Rawls's theory is inherently unable to address issues of gender injustice or if, suitably modified, it can be a useful theoretical and normative tool in women's emancipation. Sample Questions · Why, if at all, should the family be considered part of the basic structure? · Should Rawls's two principles of justice apply inside the family? · Is Rawls's theory bad for women? · Are families part of a just society? Student note: In Rawls's initial formulation of the original position, gender was not specified as one of the characteristics hidden from parties in the original position. Week 4: Justice and Race

Go to section

Note

Type: Note Notes: Rawls's theory has also been criticised for its lack of attention to questions of race and racial injustice. Critical race theorists have argued that this oversight is particularly damning given the American racial context of Rawls's work. Some have further argued that the very method of ideal theory makes it unable to analyse racial injustices. Others (mirroring feminist responses to Rawls work), have, however, maintained that Rawls theory provides critical resources for achieving racial justice. Sample Questions: · Does Rawls's ideal theory approach mean that it cannot address racial injustice? · Can Rawlsians support affirmative action? · Should the two principles of justice explicitly rule out racial discrimination? Student note: Rawls's theory has also been criticised for its lack of attention to questions of race and racial injustice. Week 5: Justice and the Egalitarian Ethos

Go to section

Note

Type: Note Notes: Feminist critics of Rawls questioned whether his theory applies to the 'private' sphere of the family. In an influential argument, G. A. Cohen has extended this critique to argue that principles of justice should apply to people's individual choices (especially economic ones). In a just society, according to Cohen, individuals would internalise and live their lives in accordance with an egalitarian ethos. Rawlsians have, however, countered that there are important reasons to restrict justice to the basic structure. Sample questions: • Are incentives a legitimate basis for economic inequality? • Is Cohen right that justice requires an egalitarian ethos? • Why, if it all, should principles of justice be restricted to the basic structure? Student note: Feminist critics of Rawls questioned whether his theory applies to the 'private' sphere of the family. Week 7: Justice and Oppression

Go to section

Note

Type: Note Notes: The previous weeks have explored a number of criticisms of Rawls's theory of justice. This week we consider an alternative approach to justice, the theory developed in Iris Marion Young's Justice and the Politics of Difference. Young criticises a range of theories of justice, including Rawls's, for following a 'distributive paradigm', which restricts justice to distributing goods across agents. She instead argues that we should understand justice in terms of overcoming domination and especially oppression, which Young argues consists of: exploitation, marginalization, powerlessness, cultural imperialism and violence. Sample questions: · Does Young's 'five faces' account of oppression provide a convincing way to capture intersectional concerns? · Does Young's methodology provide a better approach to justice and injustice than ideal theory? · Does Young's account adequately integrate concerns of both recognition and redistribution? Student note: The previous weeks have explored a number of criticisms of Rawls's theory of justice. Week 8: Justice and Equality

Note

Type: Note Notes: Rawls's difference principle has proved to be an influential, but not uncontroversial, approach to justice and equality and this week we look at two alternative conceptions. First, we examine Ronald Dworkin's account of equality of resources, in which the market and individual preferences are given a more central role. Second, we consider Elizabeth Anderson's criticisms of 'luck egalitarianism' (where the focus is on distributing goods equally across individuals), and her proposed alternative of relational egalitarianism (which focuses on equality in social relations). Sample questions: • How does Dworkin's auction differ from Rawls' original position? • What might be problematic about including individual preferences as they are in the deliberation about principles of justice? • Should equality be understood in distributional or relational terms? Student note: Rawls's difference principle has proved to be an influential, but not uncontroversial, approach to justice and equality and this week we look at two alternative conceptions. Week 9: Global Justice and Distribution

Go to section

Note

Type: Note Notes: So far, we have mostly restricted our discussion of justice to the domestic setting. Political philosophers have, however, increasingly questioned this assumption and asked whether principles of justice should apply globally. This shift has been prompted by the vast global differentials of wealth and power; various processes that can be broadly included under the title of 'globalization'; as well as political and social movements pushing for a more just global order. Political philosophers have offered competing theories of justice that respond to these developments, ranging from cosmopolitan defences of global egalitarianism, to nationalist defences of limiting justice to the state and, more recently, various hybrid accounts. This week we will study of a selection of these views. Sample questions: · Does justice demand global distributive equality? · How should a just global order be organized? · Is the global context relevantly similar to the domestic one? If not, how does it differ?

Week 10: Historical Injustice and Reparations

Go to section

Note

Type: Note Notes: The current global distribution of wealth and power can in part be traced to various forms of injustices in the past, including slavery, dispossession, colonialism and imperialism. How should these historical injustices affect our judgment about contemporary distributions? More generally, how should past wrongs figure in a theory of justice? And what should we be done to address them? These questions have been traditionally neglected in political philosophy, including in the early discussion of global justice. A growing body of literature has, however, explored these questions often in dialogue with contemporary political and social movements for reparations for historical injustice. Sample questions: • Do current societies owe the victims and descendants of past injustice reparations? • What is a 'historic' injustice? • Are economic reparations a justified and feasible form of restitution for past injustice? Student note: The current global distribution of wealth and power can in part be traced to various forms of injustices in the past, including slavery, dispossession, colonialism and imperialism. Week 11: Justice and Economic Institutions

Go to section

Note

Type: Note Notes: We have so far mainly concerned ourselves with various theories of what the principles of justice should be. This week we cover various conceptions of what institutions, especially economic ones, are required to realise these principles. Early critics of Rawls writing on this issue tended to accuse of him of simply providing a philosophical justification of welfare-state capitalism. He consequently clarified that the welfare state was insufficient to realise his principles and he instead supported either liberal socialism or a property-owning democracy. We will consider both of these sets of institutions and more broadly the question of what justice requires in terms of production and not just distribution. Sample questions: · Does justice require common ownership of the means of production? · How, if at all, should principles of justice apply to economic production?
